MARMADUKE MOUSE

The DIZZY LIZZARD

IZZY, the dizzy lizzard, scurried happily down the sun-warm road. Watching him pass, old Warner Woodehuck growled, "Look at that spotted stupe. He's as happy as if he had good sense."

The whole animal kingdom liked Izzy well enough, for he was a cheerful, jolly, harmless little fellow, but they were all privately agreed that Izzy wasn't smart enough to come in out of the rain. Dizzy Izzy, they called him, and when their own youngsters did something particularly foolish, the mothers would scold, "You've been playing with that Dizzy Izzy too much, young man! Why don't you spend more time watching the smart creatures like Phil Fox or Oscar Owl?"

Suddenly there was a swish and the shadow of sinister black wings swept across the sunlight. With squeals and gasps and cries of fright, the animals vanished into or under rocks and fallen trees.

Only Dizzy Izzy sat placidly in the middle of the road as Herkimer, the Hawk, slashed down for the kill. At the last moment Herkimer's dive broke as his immense wings beat the air. He screamed furiously, "Blast you, Izzy Lizzard! From up there you looked almost like a fat mouse scurrying down the road. I'm getting tired of wearing myself out, pouncing on you. It's just a good thing for you I don't eat lizzards."

Izzy sat up and stuck out his long pink tongue. "And it's a good thing for you, Herky, old boy, that I don't eat hawks."

Raging, Herkimer wheeled and sped away. Slowly the terrified animals came out of hiding to gather around Izzy. Rod Rabbit snapped, "One of these days, Izzy, that hawk is going to carry you up a mile or two and let you drop, just to get even for the way you tease and irritate him."

"Gee, I hope not," Izzy said. "I don't think I'd like that. I have a feeling it would make me dizzy to be up so high."

"Hah!" growled Grampa Ferret. "Your mother must have dropped you on your head when you were little. Goodness knows, you're as dizzy now as a lizzard can get."

"Lay off Izzy," Marty Mouse broke in impatiently. "The thing we've got to do is figure out how to get rid of that hawk before he gets one of us in his claws. Life just isn't safe around here since Herkimer's wife started sitting on a nest of eggs up the mountain. Now he spends all day trying to catch one of us mice as a present for her. He used to be a nice guy before the nesting season changed him."

Andy Rat spoke up. "I've got an idea. Let's offer a reward of a whole pound of cheese to anybody who can get rid of the menace of Herkimer Hawk."

"A pound of cheese," Izzy gasped. "A whole pound! Oh, boy! Now there's a reward worth working for. So long, everybody. I'm going to get busy right away so I can claim that cheese."

As the other animals stared at one another in amused dismay, Izzy went scurrying off down the road, chirping to himself in excited anticipation. A plan was already forming in his mind as he hurried. Of course, it was a dizzy sort of a plan, in a way, but then, Izzy was a dizzy sort of a lizzard.

"Where you going, Diz . . . I mean, Izzy?" boomed Bertie Bullfrog from a warm pool on the edge of the big swamp. "It's too early in the day to run so fast."

"I'm going into the big swamp to get what I need to be a little brown mouse when Herkimer Hawk feeds me to Mrs. Herkimer Hawk on account of her eggs in the new nest so I can win that pound of cheese for a reward," Izzy panted, all in one long, excited breath.

"Holy Catfish!" gasped Bertie Bullfrog. "If that isn't the dizziest explanation of nothing I ever heard. It's as clear as mud."

"Well," Izzy giggled, "you must admit, mud does cover the ground pretty well. Be seeing you, Bertie. It's nice to know you're well and kicking. I was afraid you might have croaked, tee-hee-hee!" And Izzy scurried away among the reeds and rushes, hurrying deeper into the cool shadows of the swamp.

Bertie's wife poked her head up out of the deep pool. "What in tunket are you sitting up there like a bump on a log, grumbling to yourself about!"

"Aw," Bertie croaked disgustedly, "it's that smart alec Dizzy Izzy on another one of his wild tears. Now go back to bed. You're scaring away all the flies and I'm hungry."

Meanwhile Izzy, still giggling to himself over his clever remarks, came to the edge of the cattail pond. Over his head, a forest of tall brown cattails waved in the breeze, like so many hot dogs on green sticks.

"Gee," snickered Izzy to himself. "I can't wait to see Herkimer Hawk's face when he finds out what I'm doing to him."

With a little run for a start, Izzy leaped as high in the air as he could, using his long, shiny tail for a spring. He caught hold of a brown cattail and pulled it down until the tender stalk snapped and the fuzzy brown cylinder lay on the ground. Izzy took hold of the brown fuzz and tugged and a patch came out in his hand. It was soft and furry, brown as a field mouse on one side and as white as a mouse's throat on the other.

Working steadily and smiling contentedly to himself, Izzy stripped all the fuzz off the cattail until the ground around him was covered with the downy tufts. "Now," Izzy said, "I'll need some good, soupy mud."

He ran to the edge of the swamp and began to roll over and over in a patch of soft, sticky mud. When he was coated from head to tail with the gooey mess, he ran back and began to roll in the cattail fuzz. A few moments later Izzy was coated all over with brown fuzz that stuck to the gooey mud and completely hid his own natural shiny black coat.

Izzy sat up and studied his reflection in a pool of water. "I look more like a brown mouse now than a brown mouse does," he decided happily. "Poor Herkimer Hawk, the dope."

Wearing his new, strange coating of fuzz, Izzy ambled back into the middle of the road and waited. He had not long to sit. Almost immediately there was a swish of diving wings and the grim shadow of a hawk swept down. A moment later great curved claws shut around Izzy and pinned him helplessly as Herkimer Hawk spread his wings and flapped swiftly back into the sky.

Izzy took one look at the earth, so far below, and shut his eyes tight. When he opened them, Herkimer was just flapping down to his great nest on a ledge of the mountain. Herkimer's wife, Henrietta Hawk, stood up eagerly, revealing the huge eggs she had been warming with her body.

"Oh, Herkimer," she cried. "You brought me a fat brown mouse."

"Like fun he did," squealed Izzy, wriggling out of the relaxing claws. "He brought me, Izzy Lizzard. I rolled myself in mud and cattail fuzz and Herkimer thought I was a mouse. Ha-ha! The joke's on you!"

"Ha-ha to you," Herkimer yelled furiously. "The joke's on you, Dizzy Izzy, because I'm going to take you up so high your eyeballs will freeze, and then drop you so hard you'll bounce clear into the next county. I've warned you about playing tricks on me."

"I'll bet you won't," Izzy snickered.

"Yeah!" Herkimer squawled. "Just why won't I, Nit-wit?"

"Because," said Izzy, "the moment you try to grab me, I'm going to kick your nice big beautiful eggs right out of this nest, and then we'll see who drops who."

"Whom," Henrietta corrected absently. "Oh, Herkimer, this is awful. My lovely eggs. Do something, Stupid!"

Izzy was balancing one of the eggs on the very edge of the nest. Herkimer threw himself back in the air and yelled. "Don't! Izzy, I take back all I said. I—I won't hurt you. Just don't do anything to ruin our eggs. Izzy, I beg of you."

"All right," Izzy said. "Promise to take me back where I belong and set me down safely. And promise neither you nor Henrietta will ever chase the poor mice again and I'll give you your eggs back, safe and sound."

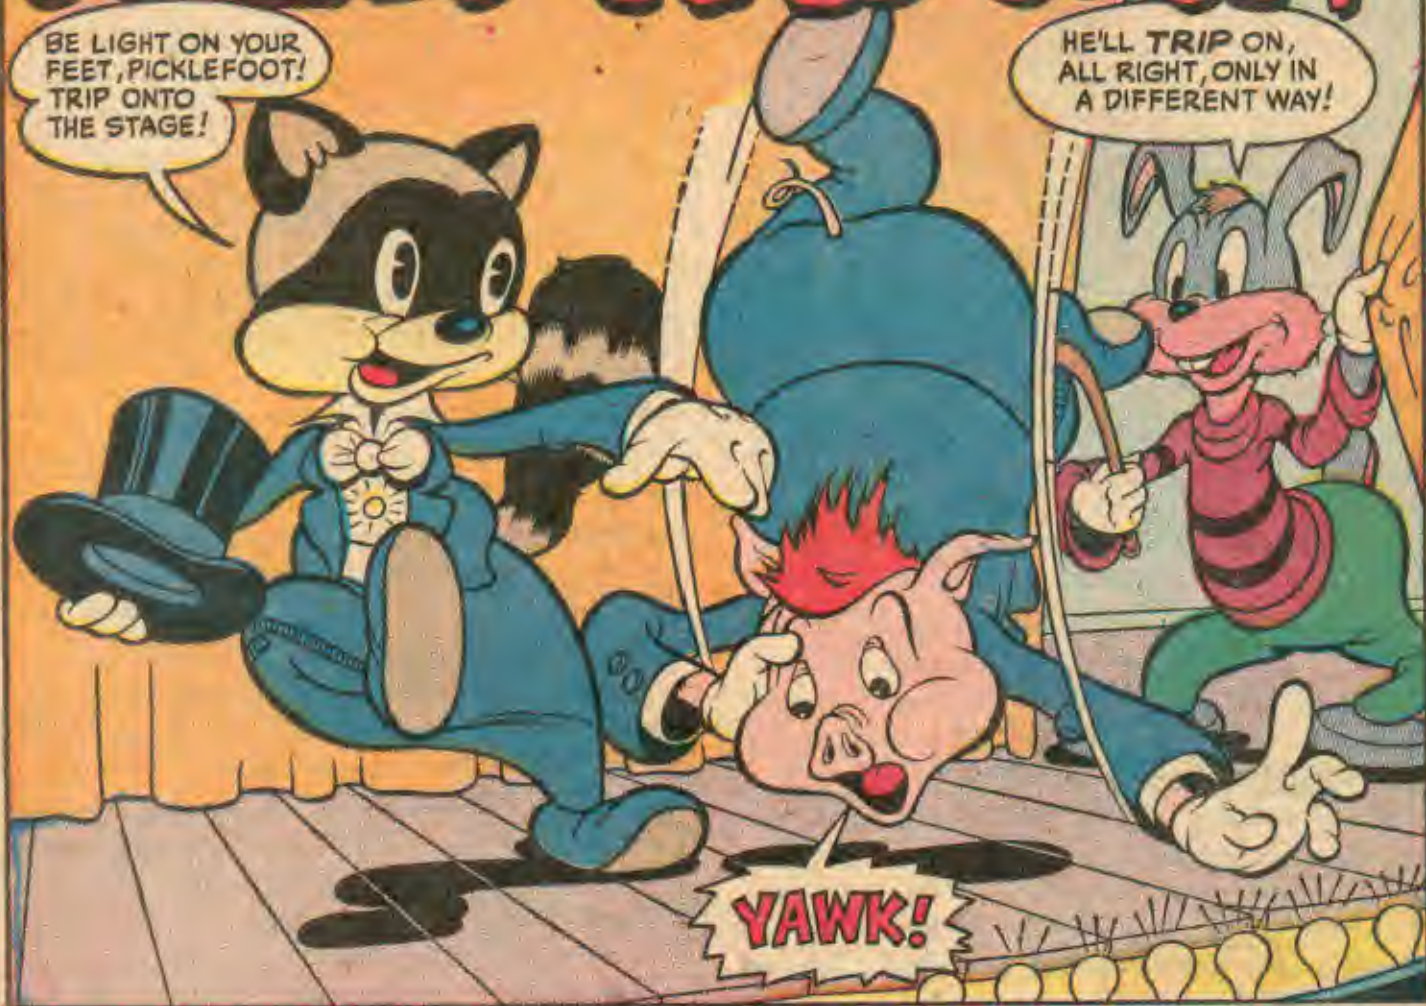

"I promise," Herkimer panted. "So does Henrietta."

Ten minutes later, surrounded by gaping, excited animals, Izzy told of his daring adventure. "Now I guess that shows who has brains," he crowed. "Who's Dizzy Izzy now?"

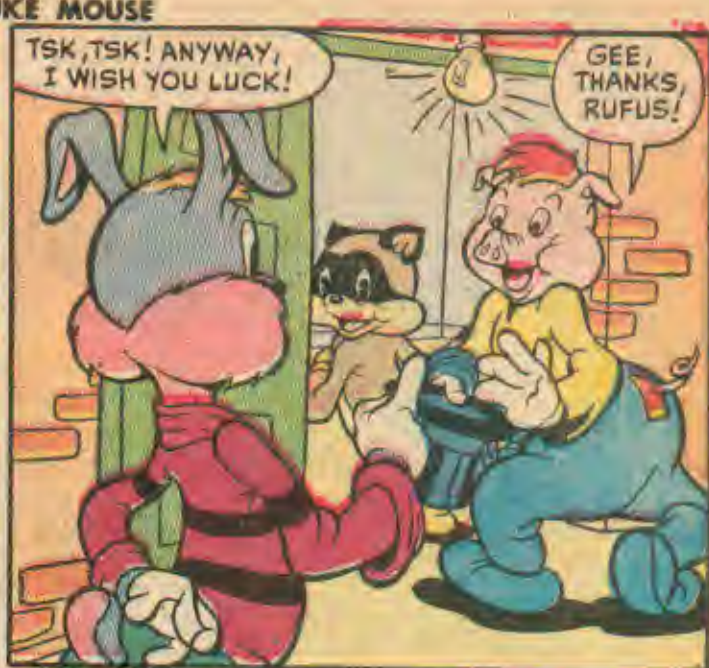

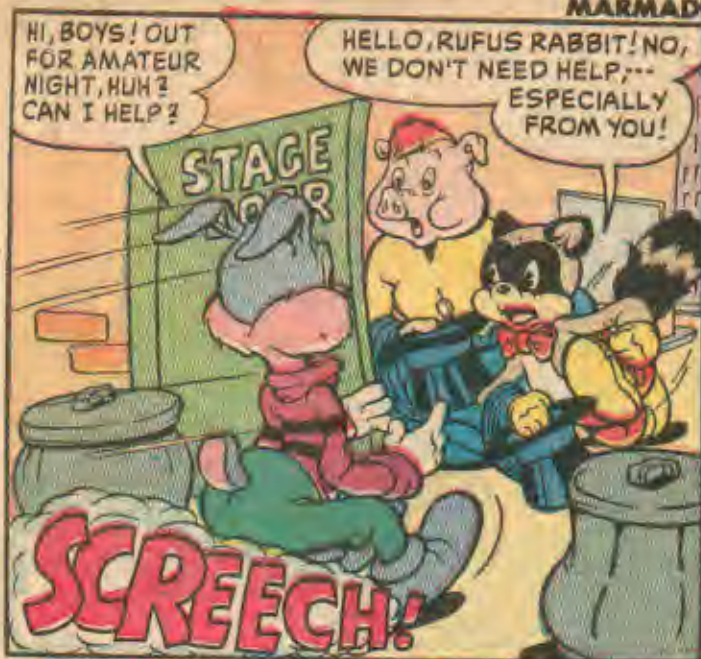

"You are," growled old Grandpa Groundhog, disgusted. "You risked your life, muddied up your nice coat, and what for? For a pound of cheese and lizzards don't eat cheese."

"Oh, my goodness golly!" gasped Izzy, clapping his forehead. "I never thought of that but you're right. I don't ever eat cheese, do I?"
